On the use of Paratragoedia in the Comedies of Aristophanes, with a comparison of his scenes and situations with those of the Tragic poets.

It is not easy to add anything new to the literature dealing with the parodic side of Aristophanes. From the days of the scholiasts to our own time scholars have turned their attention to this field until it may be said that new parodies are no longer to be found. Yet the study is an important one and most essential to a proper understanding of Aristophanes. "Kein Mittel der Komik", says Teuffel, Wolken p.17," wird von A. häufiger, in grösserem Massstab und mit mehr Mannigfaltigkeit angewendet als die Parodie."

The three tragedians fare very differently at his hands. Of Sophokles, Pabbeck (Agamem. p.272.) has well said, "Das Tragische dagegen [illegible] ist nur sehr selten und scherzhafte Erwähnung und Nachahmung beschränkt." And if we except the Ranae, where Aischylos comes off by no means unscathed, we can say the same of Aischylos. Ἐγὼ γὰρ Αἰσχύλον ποιῶ πρῶτον ἐν ποιηταῖς (Nub.1366), represents the poet's own view, just as Ran. 1518 f., τοῦτον γὰρ ἐγὼ σοφίᾳ κρίνω δεύτερον εἶναι, gives his view of Sophokles. We are left with Euripides who is shown consistently from first to last, and who finds no rest even among the shades.

It is no part of this work to discuss the fairness or unfairness of this attack: the subject [illegible] Euripides has often suffered as much at the hands of modern scholars as at those of Aristophanes himself, — but the fact of the attack remains and must be faced.

Compare the following monographs:

1. "Dissertationis de Euripidis persona apud Aristophanem pars prima." C.C. Skeel, Marburg 1845. Deals largely with the philosophic and religious side; of little value.
2. "De rebus parodiae apud Aristophanem." Hermann Tauber, Berlin 1849. Not superseded by any more recent work. The instances of parody are classified under various headings.
3. "De Aristophane Euripidis censore." F. Blanchet, Strasburg 1855. A general criticism of Euripides; of little use.
4. "Die dramatischen Parodien bei den Attischen Komikern", (Rekruten-Arbeit). W. Ribbeck, Leipzig 1864. Parodies classified under the different dramas.
5. "De Aristophane Euripidis censore." J. van Leeuwen,

Amsterdam 1876. "An excellent criticism of Euripides from Aristophanes' standpoint. Gives a table of parodies.

6. "De Parodiis in Comoediis Graecis" W.N. van der vorst Bakhuyzen. Utrecht 1877. The most complete work on parod. and the standard. Aristophanes' plays are taken up in order.

7. "De Aristophane Euripidis Irriatore." C. Kessing, Halle. 1877. Based on Wilamowitz; the thesis is that Euripides' plays between 428 and 415 are not attacked.

8. "Aristophanes und Aristoteles als Kritiker des Euripides." C. Schwabe. Crefeld 1878. Aiming to show that Aristophanes' judgment agrees more with that of Aristotle.

9. "Aristophanis de Aeschyli fraci judicia" O Hennig Leipzig. 1878

We have extensive lists of parodies with the evidence sifted and arranged, we have studies of Euripides from a sympathetic and an unsympathetic standpoint, but of the writers mentioned Täuber alone dwells at any length on the effect of parody, - the tragic tone sought. It is in this that much of Aristophanes' art shows itself. We can treasure of personal satire, of little attacks on a Kleon, an Hyperbolos, a Euripides, but with a keener mind of the bravura of tragedy, the ringing of tragic pathos, tragic language, tragic metre, with comic situations? "In der Nachahmung, resp. Verschärfung, des hohen Pathos, der sentimentalen Klage, des pomphaften Gestrecks und sonstiger Verirrungen des poetischen

Geschmacks, entwickelt Aristophanes eine staunenswerthe Virtuosität." (Muff, Charakterbild p. 19.)

It matters not whether the language is borrowed or not, or from whom it is borrowed, save of course that in certain cases a Euripidean tone is more comic than an Aischylean tone and vice versa. The Aischylean tone in [illegible] points out in the chorus in Lysis in the Acres, as supporting his view that the Prometheus was Φόρκος is [illegible] in that play, by no means known for certain, but [illegible] very likely that it is quite in keeping with the situation. And the song of Philoktetes is [illegible] because it is so like Euripides, although we cannot and need not know that the Danae is parodied.

For more frequent [illegible]

in general and not definite original, used in context for, nor are the words necessarily in the style of one poet rather than another. If the language is borrowed it does not follow that the poet is ridiculed. When Dikaiopolis addresses the sol with ecstatic joy, or when Kleon sadly bids farewell to his crown, we are not at all to assume that the [illegible] In the first case we might as well say that the Boiotian ridicules Aischylos when he bids the sol come forth. It is not ridicule: the very contrast and yet the parallelism between the situations is what the poet wants the two to be noticed, and who fails to enjoy it?

The circumstances calling for this parody of tragic tone are thus summed up by Täuber (p.14 f.) "Quum placidus et tranquillus est eorum animus qui in scena comparent, tum simplici eos et sua plane oratione uti videmus et parodiam variis animis in; quum vero vehementiores sunt in personis comicis animorum motus, quique gravius dicendi genus requirant, ubi concitatus affectus vel in dolorem profundum vel in quorsus effundatur, ubi vel lacrimis exsultat animus vel tristitia ac moerore differatur, ubi denique dubitatio afficitur vel admiratione obstupescit: hunc etiam in comoedia recens tollit, atque ad has argumenti partes adornandas longam materiam sibique patentem tragoediae Euripidis subiecit tarunt." And in such cases the effects of παρωδία and παρατραγῳδία are in the main the same.

The assumption that, when no tragic original is at hand, we have a parody of some lost play may of course often be just but is certainly in many cases unwarranted. Of course it is generally Euripides who is thought of, for the task of parody deals with him, and it is in portraying deep feeling, be it grief, despair or passion, that Euripides excells, — he is τραγικώτατος —. But [illegible] it may after all be Aristophanes'. The much-cited passage of Kratinos (from Meinek. Hist. Phil. Gr. Meineke II 225 Kock I 10) τίς δὲ σύ; κορυφός τις ἕρσιτο θρατής.

ἰποδεπτοδόρος μαμμοτιώκτης εὐριπιδαριστοφανίζων.,

is a criticism on Aristophanes from this old rival — on the Euripidean & the old comedy from the Aeschylean, and the fact was not slow to admit it. (Σκηνὰς καταδαμάζουσι Ar. Mein II 1142) χωροῦ γὰο αὐτοῦ τοῦ στόματος τῷ στωμύλῳ, τοὺς νοῦς δ' ἀρχαίους ἧττον ἢ 'κεῖνος ποιῶ. (Ἐν τῷ στόματος — Dem. Mid. 1140 g. Aristot. Rhet. 3.31, Horace de Arte Poet 323. Cic. Brut. 78.)

And side by side with borrowed language and the [illegible] conscious imitation [illegible] it is but natural that in many instances we have a mingling of both. Τὰ μὲν ἑαυτῷ πλάττων λέγει, τὰ δ' ἐξ Εὐριπίδου. (Schol Ran. 93.).

Often this tragic tone [illegible] so to speak, is so [illegible] with the scene that it cannot be treated of separately. The situation favors the way for the language, the language heightens the tone of the situation. And here again just as in the language we have scenes confessedly borrowed from tragedy and [illegible] tragic in tone, [illegible] may be just as tragic, without our knowing any borrowing, — when it is merely a scenic παρατραγῳδία. Here of course many comparisons are justifiable where borrowing is not impossible. Examples of situations clearly and confessedly borrowed [illegible] the science from the Telemedeia, the Stelenis and the Autromeda, in the Thesmo. and the Parody of the Bellerophon in the Pax, etc.

It is but a step from those scenes which are certainly, or even possibly borrowed, to those which are [illegible]. These are distinct in [illegible] [illegible] the same motif recurs. In this [illegible] have not been found by chronology for whom borrowing is out of the question, [illegible]

Such coincidences in the [illegible] are the more interesting because of a further parallelism in Euripides' style, mingling the loftiness of tragedy with the naturalness of the ordinary language of the people (Nauck, [illegible]), [illegible] which he himself could imitate, and which made Euripides such a favorite with the writers of the New Comedy, (Quintil. X. 1. 69., Plutarch. 458 (Aristot. 1450), Diphilos 402) so in situations also [illegible] lectures [illegible] showing.

[illegible] tragic. Such are the well-known passages Hipp. 747 ff. Heracl. 632 ff. 726 ff. Ion 735 ff. Electra 987 ff. So also the criticisms of Thekly menos and Thoas have been criticised as below the proper level of tragedy, and of the Prologue, the writer of the Hypothesis can himself say τὸ δὲ δρᾶμα κωμικωτέραν ἔχει τὴν κατασκευήν. (Similarly Thomas Magister τὸ παρὸν δὲ δρᾶμά ἐστιν ἐκ τραγικοῦ κωμικόν.)

Yet my comparisons are not confined to scenes where Aristophanes rises above Comedy or Euripides falls below Tragedy. Many are altogether general and serve merely to denote the occurrence of a similar motif.

I have also added a few passages (mainly from the commentators) where there seem to be reminiscences of tragedy not noted in Bakh.

In drawing from commentators I have endeavoured in every case to make acknowledgement. Further, Masthanji's "Euripides imitatus" [illegible] and Fraenkel's "Plautinisches" [illegible]. I have also drawn somewhat from Rutherford's chapter Language of Comedy.

Aristophanes shows four stages with a monologue, the Acharnenses, Nubes, Ecclesiazusae and Plutus. Are four prologues drawn that of the Ach. and Av. similar in the end, everything that of the Nubes all else unmarked language which rises above the comic level. In [illegible] is well-marked; vss. 8 and 93 are said by the scholiast to be Euripidean, note also the following:

Thomas, pointed out by Ribbeck at the schol. Schol. 331 (C 1), is carried out in detail by Bekk.

That a similar device was employed in the Telephus of Aeschylus is gathered from the same scholion as in fr. is said to imitate Euripides. Ribbeck will have it that the scholiast is wrong and that any imitation of Aeschylus is out of place. Certainly Ar. is here imitating Euripides, but as for the rest we

Εὐ. may possibly Δικαιόπολιν equipping himself with a thousand outfits with the following scene (his object was not primarily disguise but that of Telephus was.) In the corresponding passage in the Thesm. Euripides disguises himself as a woman (vv. 213 ff.); in Eccl. the two women disguised as men (vv. 69 ff.), and in Ran. the twice repeated change of costume between Dionysos and Xanthias. Enjoyed by the disguise of Dolon (Rhes. 205 ff.) & the merchant ship (Rhesos 1280 f. 942 ff.) and of Pentheus (Bacch. 928).

chorus, "διὰ τοῦτο καὶ ἡμεῖς τὸν τε πάλαι χρόνον ἀκούσαντες ἀληθῆ εἶναι ... τὸν τε νῦν ἐπιόντα ἐν λόγοις ἀποδεχόμεθα ὀρθῶς ἔχειν." Cf. also, in the preceding lines, 442, ὁρῶμεν καὶ ἀληθῆ ὄντα ἐκ τοῦ παντὸς χρόνου, and 443, ὁρᾶτε δικαίως τοὺς χορευτὰς ἡδίους γεγενῆσθαι." Both agree if we assume that the chorus in the Telephus is addressed to "quis nisi nescierunt vel ne nescire quidem sinebant quin esset manifestus ille Graecus, quod huic fabulae naturam erat ideoque ignotum esse non poterat quia haec Telephus coram omnibus dixerat et postea mutatum esse." (Ajax criticism but one which would apply to other plays as well). But the thought is not [illegible].

Aristophanes has Euripides make a similar oath. "ἐγὼ δὲ τοῦτον τὸν Εὐριπίδην ἐπαινῶ, ὅστις γὰρ εἶναρχε τοῖς χοροῖς οὐ τὰ ἀκόλουθα ἐξηρχίσατο

Possibly another reminiscence of this Psalm. The situation would suit and the language is Assyrian. The last foot however with so much parataxis is not proof. Quite similar is Ar. Ach. 1131 f. where Theoris, famous for Boeotian's frigid and strong the Lysistrata of the drama, says

Lysistrata ! and Lysistrata's proposition

Not entirely dissimilar is Ach. 1122 f. where Dicaeopolis gives his allusion to Theoris first only because the other is not of his reach.

κἀγὼ μὲν οὖν ἀλῶσιμος

285 Χαν. νὴ τὸν Δία· καὶ μὴν αἰσθάνομαι ψόφου τινός [illegible]

Quite similar is, Rhesus 528:

Διόμηδες, οὐκ ἤκουσ' — ἢ κενὸς ψόφος

στρατηγεῖ σ' ὧπερ; — τευχέων τινὰ κτύπον;

Rhesus 29: ἰὼ τίς οὗτος; ἢ κτύπον φοβούμεθα;
